Bishop Barron on "Conversion"

Over the past few months, I have occasionally referenced the "Synod on Synodality," which is the gathering (really process) that Pope Francis inaugurated, and which will have sessions this October and next October. Much has been written about it, and I think there are more than a few reasons to suspect that many within the Church (including some at the highest levels of the hierarchy) are seeking to "modernize" the Church in ways that seem more aligned with the spirit of the age than the Holy Spirit as revealed in Scripture and Tradition. Bishop Robert Barron, a former professor of mine at Mundelein Seminary, is one of the bishops appointed to attend. His apostolate "Word on Fire" is a great gift to the Church, and he is clear in his commitment to the truth and to spreading the Good News to the world. I recently read a column of his, which was entitled, "When did 'conversion' become a dirty word?" It's a good question, given the Great Commission that Jesus gave the Church, and which guides our own efforts as a parish and diocese to form parishes filled with communities of "missionary disciples." I offer these reflections of Bishop Barron for your edification:

I have recently returned from World Youth Day in Lisbon, where I gave five presentations, each one of which, as I promised, was evangelical in purpose. I made that promise in response to Cardinal-elect Américo Aguiar, the organizer of the international gathering of young people who had assured us, a week before the meeting, that he had "no interest in converting anyone to Christ or to the Catholic Church." Though my talks were enthusiastically received by crowds ranging up to twelve and thirteen thousand, I found myself rebuked, upon my return, by papal biographer Austen Ivereigh in the pages of Commonweal. Apparently, I did not understand the subtleties of Bishop Aguiar's mind and had failed to grasp the key distinction between evangelization and proselytism. On Ivereigh's reading, the former is, evidently, "facilitating an encounter with the living Christ" while the latter is "converting others to the Catholic Church." In fact, Ivereigh goes so far as to say that any effort at conversion to the Church "contradicts" authentic evangelization.

Well, one scarcely knows where to begin responding to the confusions on display here. The most obvious is the painful wedge that Ivereigh drives between Jesus and his mystical body. The Church is not a collectivity of like-minded devotees of the "living Christ," whom they presumably have found outside of the stifling confines of the ecclesial institution. Rather, the Church is Christ's body, the visible means by which he is known, the vehicle that he employs to convey his life to the world. . . .

During the confusing and often heated discussions around the meaning of "synodality," I have found it useful to turn to the story of the two disciples on the road to Emmaus, and I believe that consulting that classic text might prove helpful in this context as well. Jesus walks with and carefully listens to his erstwhile disciples, even as they move in the wrong direction. All of Pope Francis's teaching on listening and accompaniment is beautifully congruent with the opening of this narrative. It was a necessary propaedeutic, but what emerges from this, if I might put it this way, pre-evangelistic conversation is a relatively superficial and disjointed understanding of the Lord: they have many of the facts right, but they don't see the pattern. It was indeed an encounter with Christ, but no careful reader of the story would conclude that it rendered anything close to an adequate understanding of Jesus.

After listening for some time, Jesus speaks and does so definitively: "How foolish you are; how slow to understand." Then he immerses them in the Scriptures, explaining how all of the revealed word points toward him, relating to him as type and pre-figurement. Though their hearts are burning within them, the two disciples still do not fully see the Lord. Only when he breaks the bread do they recognize him, whereupon he vanishes from their sight. At that, the two disciples, who were initially walking the wrong way, turn back to Jerusalem and, with excitement, join the 11 apostles. As commentators from the ancient world to the present day have remarked, this story is a sort of icon of the Mass, including a kind of Liturgy of the Word and a Liturgy of the Eucharist, and concluding with a sending on mission. The point is that Jesus is fully encountered only in and through the Eucharistic liturgy, the prayer par excellence of the Church. Apart from a real conversion to the Church, where word and bread are broken open, people will have, at best, a fragmented sense of who Jesus is. Ivereigh concluded his criticism of me by maintaining that I was someone who, out of fear, is "clinging to identity and difference." Well, I can assure him that fear has nothing to do with it, but otherwise, guilty as charged. I proudly cling to the identity of the Church of Jesus Christ and declare it to all the world as something different indeed, a uniquely liberating form of life.

With prayers for Bishop Barron and all who will attend the Synod,

Fr. Steve
